WHAT IS MATURITY?

Maturity is the ability to control anger and settle differences without violence of destruction.

Maturity is patience. It is the willingness to pass up immediate pleasure in favor of the long-term gain.

Maturity is perseverance, the ability t o sweat out a project or a situation in spite of heavy opposition and discouraging setbacks.

Maturity is the capacity to face unpleasantness and frustration, discomfort and defeat, without complaint or collapse.

Maturity is humility. It is being big enough to say, "I was wrong." And, when right, the mature person need not experience the satisfaction of saying, "I told you so."

Maturity is the ability to make a decision and stand by it. The immature spend their lives exploring endless possibilities; then they do nothing.

Maturity means dependability, keeping one's word, coming through in a crisis. The immature are masters of the alibi. They are the confused and the disorganized. Their lives are a maze of broken promises, former friends, unfinished business, and good intentions that somehow never materialize.

Maturity is the art of living in peace with that which we cannot change, the courage to change that which should be changed--and the wisdom to know the difference.

Jury Says Doctor Not Negligent

An eight-man, four-woman jury found for the defendant in 20th District Court Thursday following two days of testimony in a malpractice suit against a Rockdale physician and hospital.

What Others Say...

A Bit Of Introspection

The following comments appeared in this space four years ago. They seem appropriate to repeat as another presidential election approaches.—Ed.

With each presidential election comes the task of explaining our dissent from the tradition that every good newspaper formally endorses one candidate or another. The task is in many ways a thankless one, the hold of tradition being so powerful few will listen carefully to a defense of eccentricity.

Yet perhaps a redeeming virtue can be found by taking the occasion to offer a few remarks on what purpose we can serve. For the reasons for our long-settled policy of non-endorsement are found in our conception of the editorialist's function. Indeed, the short reason is simplicity itself: We don't think our business is telling people how to vote.

To take the matter from the ground up, we think a newspaper's editorial columns ought to serve the same basic purpose as its other columns, which is to inform. But editorials inform in a different way, with different strengths and limitations, than factual reporting does. There is much to learn of the world that is best developed and conveyed in argumentation and speculation.

If proposal X comes before Congress, for example, ordinary news stories will quite rightly turn to a range of questions such as: Will it pass? Whose political future will it affect? Who will benefit from its provisions? Only seldom and awkwardly do news stories address a range of questions such as: Does the proposal really make sense? What would a thoughtful case for or against it look like? What is its significance in our lives and times?

Obviously these are interesting and important questions. But they are difficult to explore with the techniques of straight news reporting because no amount of digging will turn up a final answer to them. By contrast, editorials and other opinion features, precisely because the forms are manifestly those of perhaps mistaken opinion, are free to address such questions with a special rigor. The exercise, we can hope, will convey to the reader something of his times beyond what he finds even in the best news columns.

The informative value of opinion, in our experience, is best extracted by serious men working from a serious point of view. That an editorial is not merely another opinion but the opinion of a newspaper at the least means that it is the opinion of someone who is paid to take opinion seriously. At the best it means an opinion infused with insights and traditions built up over the years by successive generations of thoughtful men.

This heritage is something we believe should be taken seriously. We were flattered once when a theologian analyzed our "theology"—even though we might not express our overview in quite the same way, and even though he didn't fully approve of the theology he found. We think on this newspaper or any other, it is this accumulated heritage that produces a distinctive voice, an identity that gives context and meaning to opinion. The reader understands that this is not merely a random opinion on passing events, but the insights produced by a known outlook on man and society.

The limitation, of course, is that no one outlook produces all the insights, no heritage embraces all of human wisdom. It is of course possible and highly desirable to find room for points of view arising from contrasting heritages. But in our experience men delude themselves then they believe they can weigh all the arguments and arrive at ultimate truth, or even when they believe they can really do justice to opposing points of view. What editorial columns can do is to sharpen the case for one viewpoint, stimulate the thinking of those who hold other viewpoints, and ultimately raise the level of public debate.

With this conception of our purpose, we discuss the issues of the day in presidential years as in others. We speculate where each candidate fits in the sweep of events. If the net effect adds up to a preference, so be it; if it does not, so be that too. In either event the reader will know not a mere presidential preference, but precisely what we think, and we hope he or she will have found something enlightening in the reading.

Having done that, what does it add to pin one candidate's name on your lapel? We do not see any meaningful way in which that would either add to the reader's understanding of his times or raise the level of the public debate. In fact, we suspect that such labeling is likely to detract from the level of public debate if you take it seriously. At least, we have occasionally noticed that when even the best editorial pages become involved in campaigns intended to achieve such-and-such a political result, their arguments start to remind us less of what we admire in the scholar and more of what we do not admire in the politician. Such, we take it, are the wages of courting your own "influence."

Those are the reasons for our eccentricity about endorsements in presidential years and, for whatever it's worth, a guide to the spirit these columns aspire to in other years as well.

Oceans: Our Continuing Frontier

Writers At Sea

By George P. Elliott

Editor's Note: This is the second of 16 articles in the series "Oceans: Our Continuing rontier." In this article, George P. Elliott, Professor of English at Syracuse University, considers how the sea has captured the imagination of poets and novelists through the ages, and he asks whether the sea will continue to be the inspiration for great literature in the future. These articles, which explore the whole range of human involvement with the sea, were written for Courses by Newspaper, a program developed by University Extension, University of California, San Diego, and funded by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities.

Poems about the sea--of these there will surely never be an end so long as there are poets and the sea. But the day of the great sea stories may well be over, at least for a long time, at least in the English-speaking world.

One reason for this is the accomplishments of the literary giants Herman Melville and Joseph Conrad. Not many storytellers are incautious enough to enter what is a narrowly defined genre after its possibilities have been explored so splendidly, so exhaustively.

Sea-experience was handsomely suited for treatment by romantic realism, the dominant role in 19th-century fiction , but since Conrad that mode has been eclipsed almost entirely and with its has waned the sea-tale.

Another reason for this decline is a change in the relations of a seaman to the sea and to shipboard society.

Technology and laor unions have so drastically altered these relations from what they were a century or even half a century ago, have so depersonalized life at sea, that the sense of immediate moral, symbolic conflict identical with or inextricable from sailing a ship has been much weakened. Not a great loss to literature, granted the fine stories we already have, but a real one.

What has the sea traditionally meant to novelists and poets throughout the centuries? Just as the sea is one of the great natural givens of human existence, so it has permeated literature.

Sometimes the sea appears as a far-off power to be referred to in a passing metaphor, sometimes as the occasion of a peom or the scene of a story, sometimes as a central presence dominating the human characters of the drama.

THE MYSTERY OF THE SEA

Perhaps the sea is even more important in literature than in life because it is the strongest of natural symbols. Land and sky, too, are unimaginably vast and powerful.

But man is intimately connected with the land all his life; he can know and be at home on the land as he can never know or be at home on the sea, which retains its mystery--its otherness--no matter how long he lives on or by it. And the sky is so remote that man can never know it with that richness of sensory, emotional, economic, philosophical, religious experience with which he knows the sea. You can see a few of the things of the sky, but for the most part your knowledge of it is intellectual, thin, remote like the sky itself.

But the sea you can know in many and intimate ways, on your skin; ir your muscles, down into your inmost being and also out into those "oceanic" states of mind you share with all mankind. Nevertheless, it always remains alien and potentially dangerous.

You do not forget, when you are the sea even in calm weather, that you are there as a wary visitor, not as a native. No matter how much you love it, it will not return your love. And still, to know it well can be to learn things about the world and yourself you could learn in no other way, above all about Necessity. So we learn from the greatest sea writers, Homer, Melville, and Conrad.

Supreme though these three are, many other writers have dealth with the sea, in a fine variety of ways that need to be mentioned here.

Most simply, there are reports of voyages, battles, and explorations; but by and large they are so straightforward and plain that they rarely ascend above the foothills of literature.

A DIVINE PRESENCE

Far more complexly, poets have used the sea as an overpowering, even divine presence, the meaning of which is liable to change at any moment--like the Greek's shape-shifter of a sea-god, Proteus.

There are fantastic sea voyages that are also a kind of spiritual exploration; of these, none can compare with Samuel Taylor Coleridge's "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner." Sometimes the poet imagines himself on the shore, saying the far-ranging thoughts and larger-than-self-sized feelings generated in him by the sea, as Matthew Arnold does in "Dover Beach."

John Synge used the sea as the dominant presence in his lovely Irish play, "Riders to the Sea" (1904) and so did an old Scottish poet in the lamenting ballad of "Sir Patrick Spens."

In our own day no poet in English uses the sea more effectively than the American Philip Booth. In several of his mediatitve lyrics, the poet puts himself into complex connection with the sea along the coast of Maine, whether in fear or in reverence, whether the meaning he finds in it comes from the experience of sailing or from symbolic projection.

To the reader, it is the direct, deep, essential connection that matters most, not the shifting meanings which Booth, like many other poets, derives from or imposes upon that connection.

The greatest writing about the sea has been by writers for whom it is at once inexhaustibly marvelous--transcending the natural--and intensely real.

Of these, Homer's "Odyssey" is the first, especially those parts in which Odysseus recounts his wanderings after the fall of Troy. His pricipal adversary here is Poseidon, great god of the sea.

Turning to more recent literature, the English language contains a richer and more varied body of writing about the sea than any other.

OBSESSED WITH THE SEA

"The demonism in the world"--this phrase occurs in that crucial chapter of "Moby Dick," "The Whiteness of the Whale," wherein Melville evokes all the things of whick "the albino whale was the symbol."

The novel is nearly obsessed with the sea as Captain Ahab is with Moby Dick. But for Ahab, and to a lesser but real extent for the reader, the White Whale transcends the limit of a natural creature and all but becomes the malignancy he incarnates.

The sea, however, for everybody concerned including the reader, remains the ocean, that actual thing, at the same time tha t it radiates meanings. A story that is both a handbook on whaling and a mediation on the evil in the universe and in mankind--here, in this celebrated sea tale, you may see the working of passionate imagination bold, pure, and majestic.

No other great writer has had such extensive experience at sea as Joseph Conrad. The list of his marvelous yarns and romances and novels of the sea is long, and in them all the sea is only the sea. There are neither gods in it nor metaphysical presences, but only what is there in nature--and what is speculated about by the narrator, usually Marlow.

Conrad's primary fictional interest is in shipboard life, where interconnections among men are starker than they usually are in normal society, where stagnant boredom and repetitive work and serene calm alternate with furious activity and do-or-die struggle and violent storm in the manner of high romance, where the great moral tests are less likely to be confused and evaded. At rendering all this Conrad is supreme.

But there are limits to what a sea story can present about people, and Conrad's fiction defines one of them: no familes. Put familes on board ship and, for literary purposes, you had better have stayed on land.

In normal life, it is primarily through the family that each individual is connected with society. The endless subtleties of making and unmaking love and family are the prime stuff of most fiction which is at all realistic, and they are not accessible to seafaring tales.

Man-against-the-sea is the stuff of fable, and so is the individual in and against the tight, clear, authoritarian order of shipboard society.

Whether life on supertankers and atomic submarines will be the stuf of new fables remains to be seen.

Q: We are planning to sell our home. If we find a buyer who wants to "assume" our mortgage, instead of arranging for a new mortgage, could our mortgage company come back to us for payment of the mortgage if the buyer cannot make the monthly payments?

A: Yes. Any time you sell your home by having someone assume the balance of your mortgage, the mortgage company retains the right to look to you for the monthly payments if the buyer fails to meet them. To protect yourself in a sale of this type, the contract between you and the buyer should be written to include provisions allowing you to have title to the home returned to you in the event the buyer defaults; then, you would resume responsibility for paying off the mortgage. Otherwise, the mortgage company could sell the house and look to you for any balance remaining on the mortgage after proceeds of the sale are applied against the mortgage.

Q: How can I copyright watercolors I have painted?

A: Artists cannot always prevent unauthorized reproduction and distribution of their work. Their rights are controlled by common law copyright and Federal copyright laws. Before art works are publicly displayed, the artist has absolute control. Once art works are publicly displayed, the artist must comply with federal copyright laws which require that a statutory copyright notice be affixed to the art work, and a copyright form be filed with the United States Copyright Office. The result of failure to comply is that the artist loses all control over reproduction and sale of his work.

Forrest Guess, Sports Editor

Rockdale was able to hold onto their Number One 2A ranking by defeating the Cameron Yoemen in the district 23AA opener Friday night at Yoe Field, 14-6.

A full house plus saw the game of the year, when two powerful defensive clubs met in the Milam County Classic that gave the Rockdale Tigers the ownership of the Bell for the first time in 5 years.

It was the first win for Coach Fred Johnson and crew in their three year tenure at the Blue-Gold capitol.

In the first half the Yoemen had the blues when the Tiger offense ground out 153 yards rushing of Yoe real estate and scored in the second quarter to take the lead.

With 6:46 remaining in the first half Garry White stood tall from five yards out for the first Tiger touchdown.

The Tiger TD came after 7 offensive plays that covered 43 yards of Yoe turf. Mario Garza booted the crucial PAT and the Tigers took command 7-0.

In the first half that stat chart told the story of Tiger dominance with the Yoemen picking up only 2 first downs while Rockdale knotched the chain 10 times.

In the yardage department the Yoemen picked up 45 yards rushing the first 24 minutes to the Tigers 153. The Tigers had 10 yards from the air while the Yoemen were unable to complete on five attempts. The Tigers ran 35 plays to the Yoemen's 20.

In the third quarter the game continued to be a battle of the defenses. The Yoemen picked up 35 yards of offense while the the Tigers were able to control the quarter with 69 yards of offense. The Yoemen ran 9 offensive plays to the Tiger's 15.

In the fourth quarter the Yoemen dreaw a breath of scoring oxygen with 7:31 remaining in the game. In 7 plays Yoe quarterback Bobby Burton guided the Yoe offense 79 yards for the touchdown.

Burton connected with Greg Kelley on a 34 yard pass-run for the Yoe TD. The decision was reached and the Yoemen went for two.

On a quarterback roll-out Burton came up only inches short of the magic-line and the Tigers held onto a slim, 7-6 lead.

The momentum started flowing in the Tigers as victory looked only 7:31 away.

The Tigers took the kick and drove 59 yards in 11 plays to give them their second score of the evening.

Robert Luetge plunged across the mark and Garza followed with the PAT with 2:12 remaining and the Tigers opened the game 14-6.

The emotions of the 8,000 plus crowd either yelled or cried as the final second ticked off the Yoe scoreboard.

It was jubilance for the Rockdale fans for the first time in six long years and it took a state ranked team to unfuse the powerful Cameron Yoemen.

The Tigers ran 65 offensive plays to Yoe's 39. The Tigers took the tape with 289 yards rushing that only netted 2 TDs. The Yoe offense marched 98 yards on the ground and picked up an additional 74 yards via air. The Tigers only gained 10 yards fromthe air.

In the running game for the Yoemen Aaron Miller picked up 40 yards in 8 carries prior to an injury that took him out of the game. Burton scrambled for 23 yards in 4 carries.

In the aerial game for the Yoemen, James Pair picked up 22 yards in two completions. Kelley picked up 51 yards.

For the Tigers, Do-It-All quarterback Kerry Locklin picked up 52 yards in 15 carries. Garry White carried the pork 23 times for 113 yards to lead the running attackfor the blue-gold.

Robert Luetge had 53 yards in 12 carries, followed by Don Westley with 51 yards in 7 carries.

It was a defensive trio for the Yoemen with David Delony, Clay Kruse, and Joseph Schmidt containing the Tigers' scoring threats.

The Cameron Yoemen will travel to Elgin for the second district game. The Yoemen now stand 0-3-1 for the season. The Tigers remain undefeated with a 4-0 mark.

Reuters International News Briefs

ECONE, SWITZERLAND

A frail silver-haired Frenchman of 71 has made the former agricultural institute here the center of a storm inside the Roman Catholic Church has taken him to the brink of excommunication. Monsignor Marcel Lefebyre, former Archbishop of Dakar, Senegal, says he will continue ordaining priests at Econe in defiance of papal orders.

NEW DELHI

A century-old dispute over religious markings on an elephant has been settled, at least temporarily by a court in the south Indian state of Tamil Nadu. The dispute dates back to 1856, when two Brahmin sects in the state quarrelled over the caste mark their temple elephant should wear on its forehead--whether it should be Y-snaped or U-shaped. Both sects worship Vishnu, the the protector of the Hindu trinity, as opposed to the followers of Shiva, the destroyer.

STEINKJER, NORWAY

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization expects pro-Soviet politicians, trade unionists, and journalists in Western Europe to carry out large-scale subversive activities during the period of crisis which could precede an East-West war. A classified NATO document says the alliance thinks pro-Soviet groups or agents, in a time of tension, will commit acts of sabotage against western military bases and strategic industries such as oil fields and storage depots.

ITABORAI, BRAZIL

Three large saucers tilting skywards among green hills here demonstrate Brazil's determination to make full use of space-age communications. The plans culminate with the launching in 1979 of an internal communications satellite. Officials say it will be the first in Latin America to integrate he remote Amazonian areas of the continent-sized country into the national communication network.

LUSAKA

Dr. Henry Kissinger's southern Africa initiative has spotlighted a power struggle among Rhodesia's black nationalists that could mean the eclipse of some old-guard leaders and catapult new figures to prominence. Apart from well-publicized nationalists like Joshua Nkomo, Bishop Abel Muzorena and the Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole, several new figures are emerging from the sidelines to assume increasing importance.

SUKAMADE, INODNESIA

This small nature reserve in East Java is the home of the last three Java tigers, a species starved into almost certain extinction by encoraching civilization. If it does become extinct--and conservationists here have already given up hope for it--it will have gone the way of the Bali tiger, now presumed to have died out in that lush tropical island currently being opened up to massive tourism.

UNITED NATIONS

The U. N. law of the sea conference, concerned with everything from the freedom of navigation to the sex life of eels, is not literally in danger of running aground on the rocks. After five sessions dating back to December 1973, the biggest diplomatic gathering of its kind in history has reached an impasse over how to explit huge quantities of grapefruit-size, mineral-bearing rocks, or nodules, scattered over the deepest parts of the ocean bed.

TOPIC OF DISCUSSION -- The "Three-Cornered Building," located on State Highway 36 South on the edge of the Caldwell city limits has been the topic of much discussion in recent weeks by the Caldwell city council and the Caldwell Chamber of Commerce board of directors. The Council has requested the building's owner to raze the structure and the owner has failed to meet several deadlines on such action. The Council and the Chamber of Commerce are initiating a city-wide cleanup effort to beautify the community.

First Submarine 200 Years Ago

Although the United States Navy didn't get its first submarine until 1900, America's submarine service legitimately could celebrate its Bicentennial this year.

History's first attack by a submarine upon an enemy warship was on September 6, 1776, when an American submersible tried to sink the flagship of a British fleet.

The operation beneath the waters of New York Harbor had been personally approved by General George Washington. It almost succeeded, the National Geographic Society says.

Chased by Longboat

The one-man sub was an egg-shaped craft named Turtle. Unable to sink the 64-gun HMS Eagle, the pioneer submarine made its escape--persued by an English longboat whose crew may have been more curious than hostile.

Men had experimented with submarines for centuries, from diving bells to a weighted, leather-covered rowboat.

But Turtle's designer, David Bushnell, was ahead of his time. He outfitted his primitive vessel with a conning tower, snorkel breathing device, screw propellers for vertical and horizontal propulsion, ballast tank, and a depth gauge of his own invention.

Turtle's instruments--the depth gauge and a compass--were illuminated by cold light from pieces of phosphorescent wood.

Bushnell developed his submarine in Connecticut in 1775. Its oaken hull, made in two halves and fitted together, was only seven feet tall and six feet in diameter. Its sole occupant, perched on a sort of bicycle seat, had to be a one-man band to maneuver the novel vessel.

The narrow end of the wooden egg was its keel, weighted with lead ballast to give it stability. With his foot, the crewman could turn a valve to flood the tank below him to submerge, shutting the valve when he attained negative buoyancy.

Extra Hands Needed

To surface, he worked "two brass forcing pumps" to eject water from the tank. Underwater, vigorously cranking a handle directly in front of the operator turned a screw-type propeller that pulled the submarine forward or pushed it backward.

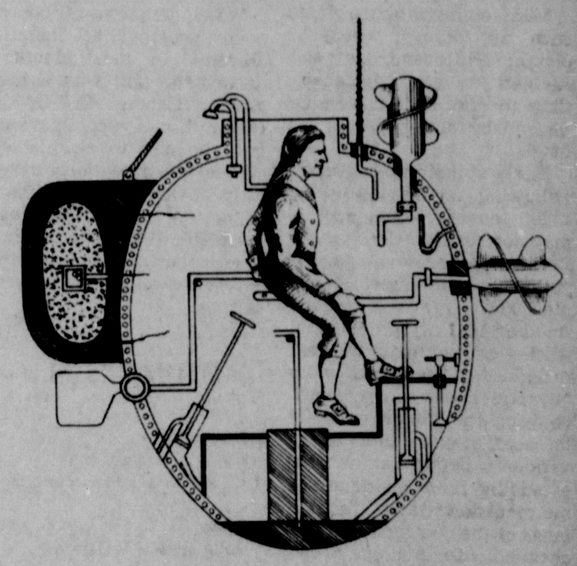
A second crank overhead turned a similar screw that would raise or lower the vessel's operating depth. Lacking a third hand, the crewman steered by holding the tiller in the crook of his arm.

Still another overhead crank was fastened to a metal rod that could be raised or lowered several inches. At the end of this rod was a bit that could be detached after it had been screwed into the hull of the unsuspecting target.

A cask with 150 pounds of powder and a timing device was attached to the bit by a line. The submarinere was to release this "torpedo" and pull away to safety before the explosion.

Sgt. Ezra Lee did everything right, but the copper sheathing placed on the hull of the British ship-of-the-line as protection against teredo worms was too tough for his auger.

Wth dawn, Lee had to withdraw.



Electric Boat Division of General Dynamics

SUBMARINE warfare was born 200 years ago when Sgt. Ezra Lee attacked a British flagship with this contraption. He tried to attach the timed explosive carried at the stern of his boat to the vessel's hull. The attempt failed when he was unable to drill through the warship's copper sheathing.

Plants Susceptible To Many Diseases

In many homes, house plants are accepted as a part of the household furnishings. These homeowners take pride and interest in growing healthy, beautiful house plants. This means that they must be on the lookout for disease problems.

Indoor plants are just as susceptible by attack by disease causing organisims as those grown outdoors. One of the major problems the homeowners has with potted plants is root rot. "Out of signt and out of mind" is an old saying that is frequently used when referring to the roots of plants. This is unfortunate, as the roots play a vital role in the growth and development of plants. Water and mineral nutrients enter through the roots, and the roots also anchor plants securely in the soil.

Many common house plants such as Coleus, rubber plants, Philodendrons, and African violets are sueceptible to root and crown rots caused by both bacteria and fungi.

Early symptoms begin with yellowing of the lower or older leaves, which may or may not result in defoliation. As the disease develops, the yellowing continues up the plant and may result in death. Another leaf symptom is the wilting or buring of the leaf margins. These yellow to necrotic areas move inward between the major veins of the leaf. Upon close observation, a decay can be seen extending from the crown of the plant downward to include most of the root system. The decayed outer surface of the root system usually sluffs off when the plant is removed from the soil.

There are numerous soil organisms that cause crown and root rot of potted plants. However, most of these organisms develop only under high moisture conditions. Excessive watering usually accompanies the onset of root rot.

Control of crown and root rot is largely a matter of sanitation and proper watering. Other control measures include the use of a sterilized potting medium, a potting medium that drains well, disease-free transplants or seed, and a fungicide soil drench. Excessive watering, especially overhead watering, should be avoided. Also, house plans may occasionally need to be repotted to prevent "pot bound" conditions that favor root rot.

When symptoms of root rot occur, remove all heavily diseased or dead plants, drench the soil with a fungicide (Captan, PCNB, or Benlate), and water sparingly. Be sure to read labels and follow directions carefully. DO NOT reuse infested potting soil unless it has been sterilized. Remember water plant s thoroughly by only often enough to prevent wilting.

Beef Values Plentiful In Markets

"Excellent" beef values are available in Texas grocery stores as the plentiful supply of heavy beef continues to show up in local markets, according to Mrs. Gwendolyne Clyatt, consumer marketing information specialist.

She cited chuck roasts and steaks and a variety of steaks lent values."

Mrs. Clyatt is with the Texas Agricultural Extension Service, The Texas A&M University System.

"Good" values at beef counters include ground beef, round steaks, boneless roasts and liver.

"Pork prices continue on the high side--with Boston butt roasts, quarter loins cut into chops and pork liver leading the list of fresh cuts.

"Smoked cuts being featured generally include semi-boneless hams, picnics, and frankfurters," Mrs. clyatt said.

At poultry counters, turkey supplies are more plentiful as the new crop starts to market--with all sizes of birds being offered at prices about the same as last week. Consumers should check for "specials" on turkey parts and turkey rolls, however, she added.

FIGHTING INFLATION

You can fight inflation by turning an old window-shade into a blackboard. Simply paint it with blackboard paint and your children can have a blackboard that rolls up when not in use.

* * *

You can fight inflation by buying milk by the gallon or half-gallon instead of quarts, as long as your family will drink it before it spoils.

* * *

You can fight inflation by remembering that if a smaller sized egg is less than 7 cents a dozen cheaper than the larger sized egg, the larger sized egg is the better buy.

* * *

You can fight inflation by knowing that freezing and storing food adds 10 to 25 cents per pound to the cost of the food itself. A freezer is a good investment when half or more of the family's food is purchased at "bargain prices" and when the family uses the freezer continuously and to capacity.
